The three pillars

Honesty, integrity, loyalty. They sound easy. They're only tested in the moments where you have the option not to deliver.

HONESTY

Telling yourself the truth about your effort.

- Saying things you actually believe.
- Staying silent when you should speak is dishonest too.
- Tested when truth is uncomfortable.

INTEGRITY

Cleanliness of conversation.

- When you say something, you do it.
- The glass holds water. No leaks.
- Tested in every commitment you make.

LOYALTY

Backing the people who back you.

- Especially when it costs you something.
- Tested only when there's an opportunity to be disloyal.
- Visible in small everyday moments.

WHEN INTEGRITY GETS TESTED

Integrity is only tested in moments where you could plausibly NOT deliver. Saying yes and not doing = low integrity. Saying "that's great" when it isn't = low integrity. Going silent when speaking would help = low integrity. The test isn't whether you said the right thing — it's whether you closed the gap between saying and doing.

The glass-with-holes diagnostic

Imagine your integrity is a glass. Every time you say something and don't do it, you punch a hole. The water leaks across the table.

LEAKY GLASS

low integrity

INTACT GLASS

high integrity

WHERE THE HOLES TYPICALLY ARE

- "I'll read it this weekend." → didn't.
- "I'll have it done by Tuesday." → still on the list Friday.
- "I'll follow up with that prospect today." → forgot until next week.
- "I'll change that habit starting Monday." → Monday came and went.
- "I'm disciplined / committed / focused." → behaviour doesn't match the words.

THE FRIDAY AUDIT

Once a week, list every commitment you made over the past seven days. Mark each one delivered / partial / missed. The missed list IS your holes. Count them. Patch them. Goal isn't zero — humans miss things. Goal is that you can SEE them, NAME them, and CARE enough to fix them.

The A / B / C choice model

Three modes of processing incoming instruction. The trajectory of your career is the trajectory of which one you default to.

MODE A

LISTEN → ACT

Builds the career.

Hear it. Get it done. No internal monologue. No excuse-loading. No negotiating with the instruction.

SOUNDS LIKE: "Got it — on it now."

MODE B

LISTEN → EXCUSE

Plateaus the career.

You heard it. You agree it's the right move. But you've already started building the reason it won't happen for you.

SOUNDS LIKE: "Yeah, I will — once I've finished this other thing..."

MODE C

CHECK OUT

Ends the career.

The instruction goes in one ear and out the other. You don't even register it consciously enough to argue with it.

SOUNDS LIKE: (no acknowledgment, no action, no memory of being told)

WHAT THE LEADER IS DOING IN RESPONSE

The leader runs their own A/B/C in parallel. Nice instructions first (their A). If that doesn't land, escalation (their B). If even that fails, they check out (their C) and quietly redirect attention to someone who responds. By the time you notice the leader's mode shifting, you're already two-thirds of the way to invisible. Catch your pattern early.

The plateau — sideways is worse than down

Regression triggers urgency. Sideways feels stable. Six months later you're still here — and the people not sideways have pulled ahead.

WHY SIDEWAYS IS WORSE THAN DOWN

- Regression triggers urgency — you see the line drop, you act.
- Sideways looks fine. You rationalise it as “stable,” “consolidating,” “maintaining.”
- Time keeps passing but position doesn’t change. Six months later, same spot.
- Compounding works against you — the people who aren’t sideways pull further ahead while you stay still.

HOW TO BREAK IT

Find your last meaningfully-up month. List the habits that were running then. Restart them. Sideways breaks when habits restart — not when the market changes or the team rotates.

The Sunday principle

Sunday is for reflection, not recovery. 2–3 hours, no screens, a notebook. The compounding advantage over reps who use Sunday to recover is enormous.

THE PRINCIPLE

“Sunday is a do-not-disturb zone. It’s an opportunity to think about how good Monday is going to be — and the rest of the week. Most people use Sunday to recover from Friday and Saturday. That’s the difference.”

THREE QUESTIONS TO ANSWER IN WRITING

1. What worked last week?
2. What didn’t work — and why?
3. What’s the ONE change I’ll make this week as a result?

THE PRACTICAL VERSION

- Block 2–3 hours Sunday morning (or whichever window is yours). Non-negotiable.
- No screens. No calls. A notebook and a coffee.
- Walk through the pattern audit — what worked at your last peak that isn’t running now?
- Identify the ONE specific thing you’ll restart or change on Monday.
- Carry the answers into Monday morning. Don’t walk in cold.

WHY THIS COMPOUNDS

Reps who keep this ritual start Monday with clarity. Everyone else won’t have it until Wednesday. Two days a week of structural advantage = 100 days a year ahead of your peers.

The soup test

If your daily behaviour was distilled into a soup and served to your team, what would it taste like? Rich and warm? Or bitter and off?

BITTER / OFF SOUP

people quietly stop coming back

MORNINGS

Grumpy, silent, late to arrive, low energy in the room.

REQUESTS

Sigh, delay, complaint about the workload, eventual reluctant follow-through.

ABSENT COLLEAGUES

Critical, gossiping, undermining behind their back.

CORRECTION

Defensive, argumentative, ego-protecting.

LOWER-VALUE PEOPLE

Dismissive, abrupt, transactional.

RICH / WARM SOUP

people come back for more

MORNINGS

Energetic greeting, eye contact, present in the room.

REQUESTS

"On it" — followed by actual delivery, on time.

ABSENT COLLEAGUES

Generous, charitable, gives benefit of the doubt.

CORRECTION

Curious, takes notes, doesn't argue in the moment.

LOWER-VALUE PEOPLE

Same treatment as high-value people. Reputation builder.

THE FEEDBACK YOU WON'T GET

Nobody on your team will tell you the soup is off. They'll just stop coming back — avoiding you, going around you, quietly looking elsewhere. By the time you notice the silence, it's usually too late to recover the relationship.

The 1% / 200% trade

You're 99% there. The 1% you're holding onto is what's costing you the 200%. Identify it. Drop it. Watch what happens.

WHAT THE 1% LOOKS LIKE FOR MOST REPS

- The pride that won't let you say "I haven't actually read it."
- The defensiveness that argues when correction lands.
- The small social commitment that crowds out the Sunday reflection.
- The "I'll process it" that becomes "I'll forget it."
- The inherited pattern you can see clearly but won't commit to changing.

THE EXERCISE THIS WEEK

Pick your 1%. Just one thing. Not five. The single behaviour, attitude, or commitment you're holding onto that is, deep down, costing you the most. Write it on a Post-it. Put it on your screen. Drop it this week.

If you can't identify it, that IS the 1%. The inability to see what's holding you back is itself the thing holding you back.

THE QUOTE

"You're 99% good and 1% the part that's holding you back. Let go of the 1% — give me the 1% — and I'll give you the 200%."

TODAY'S CHECK

Does my glass hold water?

INTEGRITY

When you say something, do it. The glass holds water. Every undelivered promise is a hole.

MODE A

Listen and act. No internal monologue. No excuse-loading. Just delivery.

SUNDAY

Reclaim 2–3 hours. No screens. Three questions in a notebook. Walk into Monday with clarity.

SOUP

If your daily behaviour was served to your team — would they want more?

1%

Identify the small thing you're holding onto. Drop it. Watch the 200% arrive.

Give the 1%. Get the 200%.
