The leadership reframe

Corie is repositioning as an investor. The senior reps are the operators of the business. Stop waiting — start pitching.

THE PRINCIPLE

“Bad boss: you work for me. Good boss: I work for you.”

OLD DYNAMIC

ROLE

Senior rep is an employee waiting for direction.

CADENCE

Corie drives daily standup and training.

DIAGNOSIS

Wait for Corie to identify what's broken.

PROBLEM-SOLVING

Look up the chain for permission.

LANGUAGE

“Tell me what to do next.”

NEW DYNAMIC

ROLE

Senior rep is the operator of their own business inside the company.

CADENCE

Senior reps drive standup; Corie is deployed on request.

DIAGNOSIS

Identify what's broken yourself. Don't wait.

PROBLEM-SOLVING

Pitch the solution to Corie like you would an investor.

LANGUAGE

“Here's what we're doing — back it?”

THE TRAP

Wanting the title without the responsibilities. Being “in charge but not in charge.” That isn't a thing. You're either running it or you're not.

The team is better. The habits are worse.

The team is the strongest it's been. Results are down. The variable that changed is not the people — it's the daily routine.

THE OBSERVATION

Same raw talent. Better people on the floor than ever. And yet results are below where they peaked. The temptation is to blame staff turnover or the market. The honest diagnosis: the daily habits stopped.

WHAT WAS RUNNING AT PEAK

- Daily morning training
Every weekday. No exceptions. The drumbeat of the team.
- 10:30 catch-up session
Focused script drilling and objection handling.
- Lead-gen feed
Qualified prospects coming into the funnel every day.
- “Spin to Win” routine
A consistent daily energy-and-accountability ritual.
- Leadership presence
Constant pressure, visibility, and coaching from above.

THE RECOVERY PROTOCOL

1. Audit what was running daily at the last peak month. Write the list.
2. Identify which habits stopped, and when.
3. Restart them — same cadence, same intensity. Not 80%.
4. Hold the line for 6–8 weeks. Watch what follows.

REMEMBER

Bad habits in, bad results out. The team is the hard thing to build — the habits are the easy thing to restore. Start there.

Audit your peak month

When results drop, the first instinct is to blame the team, the market, or the leads. The right instinct: rewind to your last winning month and audit the habits.

INSTEAD OF

- “We had a better team back then.”
- “The market’s different now.”
- “We lost our top performers.”
- “Leads aren’t the same quality.”
- “We’re trying our best already.”

TRY THIS

- “Which month did we last peak?”
- “What was on the daily calendar then?”
- “Which routines have we stopped doing?”
- “Who was feeding the funnel then — are they now?”
- “Can we restart it Monday?”

DO THIS THIS WEEK

Open a blank doc. Title it: “Peak month audit — [month/year of last peak].” Then write three lists:

LIST 1: Daily routines that were running at peak (morning standup, training, lead-gen, etc.)

LIST 2: Routines from List 1 that have stopped or degraded.

LIST 3: Specific date next week when each routine from List 2 restarts.

RULE

When results drop, your first question is never “Who?” It’s always “What habits changed?”

The unsung-hero principle

Every front-line win is built on someone or something upstream. If the upstream breaks, the front line struggles — regardless of talent.

THE ANALOGY

Beckham scored the goals. Neville fed him the ball. Without Neville feeding at exactly the right moment, the goals don't happen — regardless of how good Beckham is. The front-line performance you see is built on what happens upstream.

WHAT YOU SEE

the front line

ROLE

The closing rep on the call.

METRIC

Deals closed per week.

VISIBLE

Pitches. Closes. Commissions.

LEVERAGE

Limited — the pitch can only do so much.

WHAT YOU DON'T SEE the upstream engine

ROLE

The lead-gen team + the coaching/drilling routine.

METRIC

Quality of qualified prospects + reps' reflexes.

VISIBLE

Almost nothing — it's background work.

LEVERAGE

Massive — this is where 80% of the result lives.

PRACTICAL CHECK

When numbers drop, don't look first at the closing rep. Look first at: (1) the quality and volume of leads coming in, and (2) the daily drilling and training routine. The lever is almost always upstream.

Pick your lane

Three senior reps. Three different strengths. The trap is trying to be all three at once. The play is to pick one and trust your peers on the rest.

DISCIPLINE

The drumbeat keeper.

OWNS

The daily training, the routine, the standup.

STRENGTH

Won't let the day drift. Holds standards under fire.

TENDENCY

Can come across as hard. That's the job.

DEPLOY ON

Routine restarts. Accountability. Team's daily cadence.

FAIL MODE

Forgetting to also be warm — people-lead covers.

PEOPLE

The relationship reader.

OWNS

Internal team morale + external client warmth.

STRENGTH

Reads the room. Picks up on energy shifts.

TENDENCY

Can soften standards to keep harmony.

DEPLOY ON

Onboarding. Tense client calls. Team conflicts.

FAIL MODE

Avoiding hard conversations — discipline covers.

KNOWLEDGE

The playbook builder.

OWNS

Case studies, scripts, technical material.

STRENGTH

Builds the assets the team uses every day.

TENDENCY

Can over-engineer. Slow to ship rough versions.

DEPLOY ON

Pitch decks. Objection scripts. Onboarding docs.

FAIL MODE

Building in isolation — people-lead covers.

THE RULE

Nobody is all three. The trap is assuming you should be. Identify which lane you genuinely run in, double down on it, and trust your peers to cover the other two. Then cross-train each other from those strengths.

The punch-card model

Every action punches a hole in one of two columns: profitable or unprofitable. Unprofitable holes force costly recalibration. Maximise the profitable column.

PROFITABLE COLUMN

compound the holes

UNPROFITABLE COLUMN

each hole forces recalibration

WHY IT'S A ZERO-SUM GAME

Win a client, lose a client — net zero. Profitable habits compound: every good decision sets up the next one. Unprofitable habits don't just sit there — each one forces you to spend a profitable decision later just to break even. Two unprofitable holes cost you three good decisions worth of progress.

THE DANGER: EMOTIONAL DECISIONS

Emotional decisions are the single biggest source of unprofitable holes — because you didn't consciously choose them. They feel like reactions, not decisions. Self-awareness is the practice of catching the emotion before it punches the hole, and asking: is this action profitable, or just comfortable?

RULE OF THUMB

Top reps don't win more deals than average reps. They lose fewer — because they punch fewer unprofitable holes.

Hard now, easy later — the career-cusp window

No house. No kids. No major dependents. This is the cheapest time in life to build hard. The tsunami is coming — get to high ground first.

THE WINDOW

“You’re at the cusp of your career. No house, no family, no little kids running around. Now’s the time to drive. Build the space.”

BUILD NOW

hard now, easy later

HOURS AVAILABLE

More than you’ll ever have again.

ENERGY

Recoverable in a single night’s sleep.

HEADSPACE

Yours — not split across a family.

OPPORTUNITY COST

Low. Saying yes to work doesn’t cost much.

PAYOFF

Compounds for decades.

DELAY

easy now, hard later

HOURS AVAILABLE

Half. Family demands take the rest.

ENERGY

Depleted. Recovery takes a weekend.

HEADSPACE

Split across partner, kids, mortgage.

OPPORTUNITY COST

High. Saying yes to work costs family time.

PAYOFF

Less time to compound. Smaller base.

THE TSUNAMI

Before a tsunami, the water sucks out from the shore. It looks like more beach. Most people walk further out. The disciplined operator sees the warning and runs to high ground. The build-now decision is the run-to-high-ground decision.

The flaky-prospect script

When you can't read whether a prospect is a real buyer or a time-waster, one direct question gives them permission to opt out cleanly.

THE SCENARIO

Meeting ended ambiguously. You're unsure if the prospect is genuinely interested or just being polite. Open-ended follow-up will burn weeks on someone who was never going to buy. You need to draw the line cleanly — today.

THE SCRIPT

“I won't apologise if I sound too direct, but I also don't want you to feel obligated to come on board if it's not right for you. You're more than welcome to tell me now if it's not. Alternatively, I can give you a call in three days, or in a week — what would you prefer?”

WHY IT WORKS

● PERMISSION TO OPT OUT

Most people are relieved to have the option — they won't be honest without it.

● DRAWS A REAL LINE

Separates “not for me” (which you want to hear quickly) from “not yet” (real follow-up).

● FORCES A NEXT STEP

Three days or a week. No open-ended drift. The clock is on the prospect.

● SIGNALS ROCK-SOLID ENERGY

You're calm, you're busy, you don't need them. That confidence is itself attractive.

WHAT NOT TO DO

Don't soften the question. Don't apologise twice. Don't leave the next step open-ended. The whole point of the line is that it's slightly uncomfortable — that's what produces the honest answer.
