

SALES TRAINING DEBRIEF · SESSION 10

The 6-Week Challenge.

Authority. Sniper Calls. Bulk Cash.

Session led by Corie Dawson, Director

Wednesday 20 May 2026 · Internal sales-team summary

The thesis in one line

A major shift starts today. $60k of revenue across six weeks, $15k in bonuses on the table, two teams competing, an upsell campaign through the existing client base, and a complete overhaul of how the day runs — schedules, scripts, and oversight all centralised. The campaign isn't the test. The OPERATING MODEL behind the campaign is the test — and if you run it properly, this is the model that runs everything from here on.

"I'm going to show you how quickly you can turn a business on its ass on a dime. Six weeks. $200k in revenue. It's actually very easy. Just say what you do, do what you say, have a strategy, communicate every inch of the way." — Corie

1. The 6-week challenge — mechanics

The structural facts of what's on the table over the next six weeks. Memorise these — they drive every decision.

The numbers

- $60,000 in bonus money available across the team. Effectively ~$10k per rep if hit and split evenly.
- $200k collective revenue trigger. Hit that as a team → every rep picks up $2,000.
- Winning team picks up an additional $3,000 per rep. Six-week sprint, two teams.
- $125 commission per "dominance" package deal closed. On top of the bonus pool.
- Half-commission rule on the 4-month trial. If they convert to the full 12-month term, you receive the second half. See Section 4.

The teams

Two teams of three. Each team has a designated leader who owns the team's strategy, coordination, and morale. The leader is accountable for the team's collective number — not their individual close rate. Coach your teammates. Win as a unit.

The target

Upsell the EXISTING client base. Almost every client in the book is under-spending for their industry and category. The campaign isn't cold outreach — it's a coordinated re-engagement of clients who already trust the company but who haven't been called proactively in months. They'll be surprised. That surprise is the opening.

2. The authority reframe — opening script

The single most important move of the entire campaign. You don't open as the account manager who hasn't called for four months. You open as someone senior who is calling because the campaign came up on your radar. This single positioning shift changes the entire conversation.

How to position yourself

- You are NOT the regular point of contact. Make this explicit.
- You hold a senior title — head of customer service, sales director, GM of operations.
- You are CALLING ABOVE the account. The account manager who has been silent is below you in the hierarchy.
- You don't apologise for the silence. You explain why it's strategic: "There was no point calling without a plan."

The opening line

"Hi Bob, [name] here. I'm the head of customer service / sales director at Marketing Sweet. I know I'm not your normal point of contact. The reason for my call is your campaign came up on my radar when I was reviewing all of our accounts. I've had a look at yours — and I want to walk you through what I've seen and what we're going to do about it."

Why this works

You've done three things in twenty seconds. You've elevated yourself above the account-manager frame the client expected. You've framed the silence as strategic ("came up on my radar"), not as neglect. And you've positioned the rest of the call as you driving an action plan, not asking the client for one. The customer is now in receiving-the-plan mode rather than questioning-the-relationship mode.

"There's no apology. The minute you start apologising — 'I haven't called in four months' — they've got you. We didn't call because the results weren't there to call about. What's the point of calling without a plan?" — Corie (paraphrased)

3. The authority web page — set this up by Friday

A small but high-leverage tool. Each rep needs a personal authority web page that can be forwarded to a customer. It cements the senior-title frame in the customer's mind.

What's on the page

- Professional headshot.

- Title and short bio — what you own, how long you've been doing it.
- A 60–90 second video introducing yourself and explaining your role.
- A direct phone number that routes to the support ticketing system (so calls don't bounce).
- A clean URL — easy to type, easy to remember.

When to send it

At the end of the first call, once trust is built: "I'll send you my profile so you have my direct details — you can reach me directly if anything comes up before our next check-in." The web page does the authority-cementing for you between calls.

4. Pigeonholing on resistance & the backlink cheat sheet

When the client pushes back on spend, two specific tools come out: pigeonhole pricing (anchor high, view to come down) and the backlink cheat sheet (quantitative authority).

Pigeonhole pricing

Don't open with the price you'd settle for. Open with the price you want, with a clear view to coming down by one tier if needed. The standard play in this campaign:

- Open at $550/mo (authority package). View to come down to $300/mo if resistance is heavy.
- Don't soften the opening with hedges like "I was thinking maybe around..." — state the number, then justify it.
- If they say "I don't want to spend more," respond: "I understand you don't want to. The question is what you NEED to."

The backlink cheat sheet

Every quote you give should be backed by specific industry numbers. The cheat sheet (being prepared) will list, for every product tier, the backlink count per month — and the industry standard for the prospect's category.

""You're currently on 14 backlinks per month. Industry standard for your category is 63. That's 4.5x what you're currently doing. Without that volume, organic ranking is mathematically very difficult. What I'm recommending is the authority package — 126 backlinks per month. That's 9x your current quota. THIS is the number that moves your campaign.""

Why this works

You've replaced a price conversation ("Why is it so expensive?") with a math conversation ("Why are you under-resourced?"). The client can't argue with backlink mathematics the way they can argue with pricing perception. The cheat sheet does the heavy lifting — once you have the numbers, every pitch becomes a quantitative recommendation, not a sales push.

5. The 4-month trial override

A specific concession Corie has authorised reps to deploy during this campaign — and only during this campaign. Instead of asking the client to commit to the full 12 months upfront, you can authorise a 4-month trial.

How it works

- The client signs a 4-month trial term.
- At the 3-month mark, you (or someone from the team) calls them.
- They decide whether to roll into the remaining 8 months of the standard 12-month term.
- Reps receive 50% of the standard commission on signup. The other 50% is paid IF the client converts to the full 12-month term.

How to position it on the call

“Normally I'd ask for a full 12-month commitment — that's how the work compounds. But because you've been with us for [X months / years] and I want this to be easy for you, I can authorise a 4-month trial. At month three, you'll get a call. If you want to continue, we roll into the remaining 8 months. If not, you walk. That gives you a proper window to see if this is working.”

Why this works

- Removes the "12-month commitment" objection without removing the duration we need.
- The rep has authorisation power — that's itself an authority signal.
- Half commission upfront, half on conversion = the rep is motivated to deliver real results in the trial window.
- At month three, the call is no longer about persuading them to commit — it's about confirming what they've already experienced.

6. The sniper approach — every call planned

A direct shift from how the team has been operating. Cold calling and "see how it goes" is over. Every appointment is treated like surgery — preparation hours before, with a documented plan reviewed by Corie before the call goes out.

“You don't just go “who's the patient, what do they need,” and start cutting. They do a consultation, an MRI, an X-ray, an ultrasound. They want to know everything before they cut into the body. That's how you handle every call now.”
— Corie (paraphrased)

The daily protocol

1. Schedule is set the day before. You know which 3–4 clients you're calling tomorrow.
2. For each, prepare an action plan: current spend, current backlinks, industry standard, recommended package, opening line, expected objection, response.
3. Bring all four plans to morning catch-up. Walk through them with the team and director. Adjust if needed.
4. Make the calls in the assigned window. Take notes immediately after each.
5. Debrief at end of day. What worked? What didn't? What's the change for tomorrow?

Zero fatalities — the rule

If you LOSE an existing client during the campaign, you have to sell twice as hard to make the ground back. Every call has only two acceptable outcomes: upsold (the client commits to a higher package) or held (the client stays where they are and agrees to a follow-up). Lost clients are not acceptable. If a call is heading toward a loss, back off and book a future re-engagement — don't push them into "I'm leaving."

"You don't lose a deal. You lose a deal, you have to make it up. You've got to sell it twice — so you might as well sell it once. One bullet, one kill. Test the win. Test everything. Run it by me. Every single deal." — Corie (paraphrased)

7. Calendar control — the new operating model

A major operational shift announced this session. Reps no longer control their own calendars. The schedule is owned centrally and assigned daily.

What changes

Old model	New model
Rep controls own calendar.	Calendar is owned centrally; assigned the day before.
Pick which clients to call when.	Receive a list of 3–4 appointments per day.
Self-managed prep time.	Daily catch-up to review the day's pitch plans.
No oversight on call quality.	Every call plan reviewed before it goes out.
Calendar drift is normal.	Compressed calendar. Anything not done by Friday 2pm rolls forward.

Why this changes everything

There's a recognised pattern called Parkinson's Law: work expands to fill the time available. When reps own their own calendars, the day fills up with low-value work because the time exists to fill. When the calendar is compressed and assigned, the same reps complete more revenue-generating work in less time. The trade is: less autonomy over WHEN you do things, in exchange for finishing earlier and earning more.

"I'm going to knock you off at 2pm every Friday. Anything that needs to happen, happens Monday to Thursday. That means full focus Monday to Thursday — no drift, no spread, no 'I'll get to it later in the week.' Compress the time, compress the work." — Corie (paraphrased)

8. A → A communication — the campaign edition

The A/B/C model from Session 9 is the operating system that makes this campaign work. The campaign cannot run on B-mode communication. Every brief, every adjustment, every escalation requires A → A — listen, ask in the moment, act.

What A → A looks like in this campaign

- Director: "I want you to call Client X today at 2pm. Use the authority package as the anchor."
- Rep (Mode A): "Got it. Two questions before I call — are they at $300 or $550 currently, and do we know if they've had any recent issues that might come up?"
- Director answers, rep acts.
- Compare to Mode B: "Yeah, I'll have a think about whether the authority package is right for them and let you know later." → that's the conversation that loses the deal.

The acceptable forms of disagreement

Disagreement is welcome. Just not as B-mode going-off-to-process. If you think the brief is wrong, say so IN the conversation. "Actually I'd push for momentum, not authority, because their backlink situation is X. Want me to test that?" That's A-mode disagreement. It moves the campaign forward; B-mode disagreement freezes it.

9. Pack vs lone wolf — collective leadership

A specific call-out for any team lead operating in this campaign. The instinct to handle problems alone — to "not bother anyone" with what's breaking — is selfish, even when it feels heroic.

"I'd rather be a pack animal and eat the lone wolf. I'm not into glamour and honour and all that stuff. I just want to destroy what has to be destroyed, and it doesn't matter how I do it." — Corie (paraphrased)

Why lone-wolf leadership fails here

- The campaign is collective. You can't carry a $200k target alone.
- Problems hidden from the team compound silently. The team finds out when the deal is already lost.

- Lone-wolf leaders set a model the team imitates — and then nobody escalates anything.
- A leader hiding the score is the easiest way to lose a six-week sprint. There's no time to recover.

What pack leadership looks like

- Every team meeting starts with: "Where are we vs the number?" — public, transparent, honest.
- Every blocker surfaces within 24 hours. No "I've been trying to figure it out for a week."
- You ask your teammate for help BEFORE you're drowning. The ask is itself a leadership signal.
- You celebrate teammate wins as if they were your own. Because in this campaign, they ARE.

10. Manage the reaction, not the feeling

A short but important segment. Corie shared a personal story about an emotional reaction to a problem at home — the impulse to lash out at the immediate cause. The principle: you can't stop how you feel. You can stop how you act.

"It's not the way you feel — it's the behaviour. The way you feel will always be similar — you're going to want to argue, you're going to want to defend, you're going to want to react. The work is the behavioural step you insert before the reaction lands." — Corie (paraphrased)

Translated for the campaign

You will get rejected on calls. You will get prospects who push back hard. You will have days where two close out and three escape. The feeling — frustration, defensiveness, the urge to fight — won't go away. The work is to feel it, NOT act on it in the moment, and respond from a calmer place 30 seconds later.

- Don't reply to a rejection email when you're still angry. Wait two hours.
- Don't call the next prospect ten seconds after a frustrating call. Take a five-minute reset.
- Don't respond to a teammate's push-back defensively. Repeat their concern back first.
- Don't blame the schedule when a meeting falls through. Find a recovery slot in the same day.

11. The bulk cash / less work trade

Corie's closing frame for the session. The goal is bulk cash and less work. The path to getting there isn't less work — it's a temporary spike of MORE work, executed properly, that compounds into a state where the work IS less.

Where we are now	Where the campaign takes us
Current state — what the team has been running	Target state — what the campaign produces if executed
Average cash, lots of work.	Bulk cash, less work.
Reps own scattered calendars; days fill with low-value work.	Centralised calendar; days are compressed and focused.
Pitches improvised in the moment.	Pitches planned three days in advance, reviewed before going out.
Communication is B-mode — agreement followed by drift.	Communication is A-mode — clarification followed by action.
Friday is the day you finish exhausted at 7pm.	Friday is the day you knock off at 2pm with the week done.

“Easy now, hard later — average cash, lots of work. Hard now, easy later — bulk cash, less work. Same trade, just at the scale of a six-week campaign.” — Corie (paraphrased)

12. What to do this week

- Set up your authority web page by Friday. Photo, bio, video, direct number routing to the ticketing system. URL ready to send.
- Memorise the campaign mechanics. $200k team trigger. $2k per rep at trigger. $3k for winning team. $125 per dominance deal. Half-commission on trials.
- Drill the authority opening line. Out loud. With a colleague. Until it's reflexive. No apologies, no soft-peddling.
- Wait for your assigned call list. You no longer pick. Use the assigned list. If you have slack capacity, ask for more — but don't self-select.
- Pre-prep every call. Spend, backlinks, industry standard, recommended package, opening line, expected objection. Bring to morning catch-up.
- Use the 4-month trial as your closing tool. It's your authorised concession. Frame it as a favour ("I can authorise this for you because you've been with us for X").
- Operate in A-mode at all times. Hear the brief. Ask questions in the moment. Act. No "let me process it" — that's the campaign-killer.
- Surface blockers within 24 hours. Don't lone-wolf it. The pack runs faster than the wolf.
- Insert the behavioural pause. Feel the rejection / frustration / push-back. Don't act on it for 30 seconds. Respond from the calmer place.

Final reminder. The six-week challenge is the visible thing. The real thing is the operating model running underneath it — centralised calendars, pre-planned calls, A-mode communication, pack leadership, behavioural discipline. If you execute the model properly, the $60k revenue follows. If you execute the model casually, the model dies with the campaign — and the team goes back to average-cash, lots-of-work mode by Christmas. Run the model.
