

Urgency. Hold the Line. Close It Today.

Buyer interest falls off a cliff the moment you hang up. Call back in five — with one better — and close the loop in the same window the buyer was hot.

WHAT'S INSIDE

- 01 What urgency is
A tempo, not a panic. Move at the speed of the deadline.
- 02 Hold-the-line protocol
5-minute callback. The drill that keeps the deal hot.
- 03 The interest cliff
Buyer interest decays fast. The hill grows by the hour.
- 04 The "one better" move
Director-authorised bonus. Re-engage with value.
- 05 Easy yeses can be decoys
Test them. Real ones take the path.
- 06 No is information
Find it fast. Move on. Real deals get more time.
- 07 Daily reference card

Hold the line — or call back in five.

When the buyer asks a question you can't answer instantly, the response is one of two scripts. Both keep the deal hot.

OPTION A · HOLD THE LINE

"Hold the line — I'll find out for you right now."

Step away from the desk for 60–90 seconds. Come back with the answer. The buyer stays warm because they didn't hang up.

OPTION B · CALL BACK IN 5

"Let me give you a call back in five — I'll find out now."

Hang up. Five minutes later, call back with the "one better" — a director-authorized bonus the buyer didn't ask for.

THE 5-MINUTE CALLBACK SEQUENCE

01 Buyer asks the question

"Can I pay up front?" / "Can I do it monthly?" / "Can you take 10% off?"

02 Rep says "five minutes"

"I'll call you back in five — I'll find out for you now." Hang up.

03 Rep calls back inside the window

Five minutes. Not ten. Not later that day.

04 Rep opens with the "one better"

"Great news — director said we can do one better for you."

05 Rep closes the loop

"No rush, by the end of the week as you planned — but if you want to move now, here's the deposit link."

The interest cliff.

Buyer interest does not stay flat after you hang up. It falls off a cliff — and the hill grows by the hour.

THE READ

Most of the buyer's engagement disappears in the first hour. By Friday, the deal is a stale pitch. Don't pray for a Friday resurrection — close on Monday and use Friday to confirm.

The "one better" move.

The callback is not a chase. It's a small gift the buyer didn't ask for — authorised by the director, framed as news.

THE OPENING LINE

"Great news — I've gone one step better than just getting it organised. The director said we can give you a free month. No rush, by the end of the week as you planned — but I wanted to give you something to think about now."

ANATOMY OF THE MOVE

01 Frame the bonus as director-authorised

Not the rep's gift. The director gave it. That makes it feel earned by the buyer's seriousness.

02 Pair the value with the relaxed close

"No rush, by the end of the week as you planned" — the bonus is value; the relaxed line is trust.

03 Don't make the buyer earn it

The whole point is that they didn't have to push for it. Make it feel like a small reward, not a concession.

04 Use the move once

Burning it twice in a week reads as a discount tactic, not a director relationship.

Easy yeses can be decoys.

When the buyer suddenly wants the bigger package or to pay up front, be a little sceptical. Test it before you celebrate.

WHAT IT LOOKS LIKE

- "I want to pay the whole thing up front."
- "Actually, can I upgrade to the bigger package?"
- "Can we start tomorrow morning?"
- "Send me everything and I'll let you know."

WHY IT MIGHT BE A DECOY:

An easy yes creates a logistics gap ("call me back to sort it"). The buyer then doesn't pick up. The "yes" was the polite way to end the call.

HOW TO TEST IT

- Offer the small deposit instead of full payment.
- Confirm the timeline and book the next step now.
- Send the proposal + deposit link before hanging up.
- Ask for the email and send it on the call.

WHAT IT REVEALS:

Each test removes the gap a decoy needs. Real yeses take the path. Decoy yeses suddenly have a reason they can't commit right now.

THE PRINCIPLE

Test every easy yes. Real yeses survive the test. Decoy yeses reveal themselves the moment you remove their exit gap.

No is information.

Don't fear the no — chase it. A clear no returns your most expensive resource: your time.

FEAR OF NO · THE TRAP

Rep avoids asking questions that might surface a no. Marginal deals stay on the pipeline for weeks. Real deals get less attention.

WHAT IT COSTS:

- Pipeline clutter that hides the real opportunities.
- Time wasted on people who weren't going to close.
- Energy drained by unresolved maybes.
- Decisions deferred indefinitely with no signal.

CHASE THE NO · THE WIN

Rep asks the question that surfaces the no early. Marginal deals close (as no) fast. Real deals get the rep's full attention.

WHAT IT WINS:

- Pipeline becomes a real signal of real deals.
- Time returns to the rep — to spend on real buyers.
- Energy stays high because there are no zombie deals.
- Forecast accuracy goes up. Predictability goes up.

THE SHIFT

Stop trying to predict when they'll say yes. Start trying to surface when they'd say no. Yeses happen when they happen. Nos return your time today.

Daily reference card.

Print and pin. Read before every pitch.

DO · EVERY DAY

- Use the 5-minute callback when a question comes up.
- Call back with the "one better" — not the same offer.
- Aim to close on Monday — confirm on Friday.
- Test every easy yes with a small-deposit move.
- Send the short text-message recovery on a missed call.
- Ask the question that surfaces a no early.
- Cap your bookings. Prepare for the ones you take.
- Treat 5 minutes as the deal window — not next week.

DON'T · EVER

- Don't say "I'll get back to you tomorrow."
- Don't call back with nothing new.
- Don't wait for Friday to close a Monday pitch.
- Don't celebrate easy yeses without testing them.
- Don't call ten times when one text recovers the deal.
- Don't avoid the no — chase it.
- Don't stuff the calendar with shallow bookings.
- Don't pretend Friday's call will resuscitate the deal.

WATCH-OUTS

- Getting urgent only when you're about to lose.
- Treating "Friday" as a real commitment date.
- Using the "one better" twice in a week.
- Forgetting the bonus needs to feel director-authorised.
- Letting easy-yes energy override the test instinct.
- Mistaking pipeline clutter for pipeline strength.
- Confusing politeness with commitment.
- Running the protocol mechanically — energy matters.

THE ONE-LINER

Urgency is a tempo. Hold the line. Call back in five. Close on Monday. Find the no fast.
