

Reheat the Pie. Sell the Appointment Twice.

A booking made yesterday is a cold pie today. Reheat it the day before with high energy + a short prep ask.

WHAT'S INSIDE

- 01 Bookings go cold
Lead-gen passes the buyer — not the buyer's commitment.
- 02 The day-before script
Four-part call that reheats the appointment.
- 03 Time as currency
The 5–10 minute frame. Asymmetric risk.
- 04 Sell it twice
Lead-gen sells the booking. You sell it again on confirm.
- 05 The full-calendar trap
A full calendar is the next job — not the reward.
- 06 The "next step" close
Said as a statement, the buyer can't politely exit.
- 07 Daily reference card
Print and pin. Read before every confirmation call.

Bookings go cold.

A booking made on Monday is fresh. By Wednesday it's a cold pie. The same deal — half the engagement.

FRESH PIE · RIGHT AFTER BOOKING

- Buyer remembers the lead-gen call
- Buyer is curious and engaged
- Buyer expects the meeting to happen
- Energy is high. Defences are down
- A short, focused pitch lands easily

COLD PIE · THREE DAYS LATER

- Buyer barely remembers booking it
- Buyer's attention has moved elsewhere
- Buyer is looking for a reason to skip it
- Energy is gone. Defences are up
- Even a great pitch hits a flat audience

THE PRINCIPLE

The pie is the same. The buyer's engagement isn't. Reheat it the day before — or arrive to a meeting nobody wants to be in.

The day-before confirmation script.

Four-part call. High energy. Reference. Prep ask. Timing.

HIGH ENERGY OPENER

01

"Hi Jeanette, it's Philippa here from Marketing Sweet — really excited to catch up with you tomorrow."

REFERENCE THE LEAD-GEN CALL

02

"I had a look at your website after Sean's chat with you on Wednesday — I can see exactly what he was talking about."

SHORT PREP ASK

03

"For tomorrow, could you send me three competitors you'd really like to win work from? It'll help me prepare properly."

CONFIRM TIMING + TONE

04

"We've only got 5–10 minutes booked. I just wanted to make sure you knew what to expect — does that all sound good?"

THE OUTCOME

The pie is back in the microwave. The buyer remembers why they booked — and arrives prepped.

Time as currency.

Frame every meeting as 5–10 minutes. The buyer's biggest objection is defused before it's voiced.

THE FRAME

"We've only got 5–10 minutes booked." Said in the confirmation call. Said again in the opener. Never literal — always the frame.

WHY IT WORKS — ASYMMETRIC RISK

01 Defuses the biggest buyer objection

"I don't have time" is the #1 reason buyers cancel. Naming a 5–10 minute window removes the objection before it forms.

02 Buyer keeps control of the window

If it runs 45 minutes, the buyer extended it themselves — and won't get angry at the rep for it.

03 Short windows feel like easy yeses

A buyer hesitates over a 60-minute commitment. A 5–10 minute commitment feels frictionless.

04 Sets up the 'oh that was easy' moment

If the meeting genuinely takes 8 minutes, the buyer is delighted. If it takes 40, they don't notice — because the rep is delivering value the whole way.

Sell the appointment twice.

Lead-gen sells the booking once. The receiving rep sells it again on the confirmation call.

SELL #1 · LEAD-GEN

Lead-gen rep makes the booking. Buyer's interest is fresh. Energy is high.

WHAT THEY DO:

- Open the door.
- Hand over basic context.
- Set the booking time.
- Pass the buyer's contact info.

SELL #2 · RECEIVING REP

Receiving rep makes the confirmation call. Reheats the buyer's interest. Sets up the meeting for success.

WHAT THEY DO:

- Run the four-part confirmation script.
- Reframe the meeting's value in fresh terms.
- Ask for one small prep task (creates investment).
- Set the 5–10 minute frame.

THE HAND-OFF

Skip the second sell, and the buyer's belief in the meeting decays. Run it well, and the buyer arrives with conviction restored.

The full-calendar trap.

A full calendar is the next job — not the reward. The work has just begun.

TRAP MINDSET

"Thank god, my calendar is full this week. Some will fall out — that's normal."

WHAT HAPPENS:

- Reps stop prep work because bookings are 'done.'
- Confirmation calls get skipped or rushed.
- Buyers cool. Cancellations and no-shows rise.
- Conversion settles at industry-average.
- Twelve bookings → two deals.

WIN MINDSET

"Calendar is full — now the work begins. Every booking gets reheated."

WHAT HAPPENS:

- Every booking gets the day-before script.
- Every meeting opens warm, not cold.
- Buyers arrive prepped — they completed a task.
- Conversion lifts dramatically.
- Twelve bookings → eight or nine deals.

THE REFRAME

A full calendar isn't the finish line. It's the starting line. Every booking deserves the same effort as if it were your last.

The "next step" close.

Said as a statement, the buyer can't politely exit. Said as a question, they always will.

STATEMENT · WORKS

"Sounds like you're ready to go the next step." Said with flat intonation. No upward inflection. Period — not question mark.

QUESTION · FAILS

"Are you ready to go the next step?" Upward inflection. Question mark. Gives the buyer a clean exit — "let me think about it."

DELIVERY NOTES

- Practise the flat intonation out loud. Most reps default to a rising tone.
- After saying the line, stay silent. The buyer will break it.
- The next thing the buyer says reveals whether they're in or out — listen carefully.
- If they say "what's the next step?" — that's a yes, dressed as a question.

Daily reference card.

Print and pin. Read before every confirmation call.

DO · EVERY BOOKING

- Run the day-before confirmation call.
- Open with high energy.
- Reference the lead-gen conversation.
- Ask for one small prep task.
- Frame the meeting as 5–10 minutes.
- Sell the appointment twice.
- Treat every booking like it's your last.
- Use the statement-form "next step" close.

DON'T · EVER

- Don't skip the confirmation call.
- Don't call straight after the booking — wait until the day before.
- Don't show up with low energy.
- Don't ask "are you ready to buy?" as a question.
- Don't trust a full calendar to convert by itself.
- Don't defend when the buyer says "don't pressure me."
- Don't promise a literal 5-minute meeting.
- Don't assume the lead-gen call transferred the commitment.

WATCH-OUTS

- Confirmation calls that drift into the meeting itself.
- Reps who skip confirmation when calendar is full.
- Buyers who can't remember being booked.
- Long gaps between booking and meeting.
- Rising intonation on the close — kills it.
- Performative cheer instead of genuine excitement.
- Booking too far out (3–4 days max).
- Reading the script flat instead of warming the tone.

THE ONE-LINER

Bookings go cold. Reheat the pie. Sell it twice. The next step is the close.
